not speak. However, after the Air Vice Marshal had finished complimenting me, and everybody else with a Scottish name, he being a Scot himself, I volunteered to say a few words. This turned into a discourse of some twenty minutes duration, and we had an enjoyable informal evening.

April 11, 1962 - Wednesday

Tom Finletter came to see me this morning. He and Gay have come over for a few days recreation in London. He is concerned over the question of some multi-national arrangement by which nuclear arms would be supplied to NATO. He is also unhappy over the lack of authority given to his British colleague, Mason, to participate fully in the proceedings of the permanent representatives.

The Finletters lunched with us, as did Helen Hull, Sir John Marriott, Baroness de Waldner, Lady Abingdon, Mr. Lubbock, Mrs. Hamilton, and Al Wells.

The Chilean Ambassador, Santa-Cruz, and Prince Dimitri came to see me this afternoon. Dimitri, who has Greek blood, wants to organize a social club and have a big annual reception for admirers of Greece, especially those who are fairly frequent visitors there. I told him I could not be an honorary vice president if there were any commercial objectives in view. He assured me there were not, so on this basis he and Santa-Cruz went off to do more recruiting of Ambassadors.

Anthony Greenwood and three fellow MP's, Slimwell, Brockway, and Driberg, visited me to present a petition for transmittal to the President, protesting against the resumption by the U.S. of atomic tests. We had an entirely amiable conversation for an hour. I tried to explain why we would feel impelled to renew our tests if, as is now improbable, the Soviets continue to be unreasonable in rejecting the offer made by the UK and ourselves to cancel them if agreement on suitable inspections and control measures were shortly reached.
